MOVING FORWARD BY LOOKING BACK

Solo Can Grow Business By Using Personal Touch

By RENEE C. BERMAN

In 2009, people lost homes, lost jobs and lost hope.

The National Law Journal reported that in the past year, the 250 largest law firms across the country laid off more than 5,000 attorneys. The economic crisis has devoured our financial security and has emboldened many attorneys to take the plunge into entrepreneurship. Both those who have just taken the plunge into solo practice and those who have long grappled with the struggles and triumphs of self-employment are faced with the challenge of keeping up with technology effectively and cost-efficiently; however, sometimes the old ways are the best ways.

Technology has invaded our lives and our law practices, but not all for the better. I have a bookcase filled with my favorite books. The pages are yellowed and the corsolete and bookshelves will be filled with nothing more than dust collecting knick knacks.

Twitter. Facebook. LinkedIn. Blogging. Social Media. All are words and phrases that did not exist during the days when school children needed to go to libraries to write science reports. The question is not whether a computer can be found in a home but rather how many computers or laptops are found within a single home.

Most people spend hours every day staring at the glowing screen and typing on the slightly worn keypads both at work page does not mean you are actually of any significance to these people.

Staying Relevant

While some attorneys are clinging with a white-knuckled grip to the former marketing ways of a time long gone, most acknowledge, even if they do not like, the rainmaking ways of today.

The goal of marketing is to keep yourself and your business in the forefront of the minds of potential clients and peers so that they think of you and only you when they need an attorney to retain or refer a matter. Irrefutably, solo and small firm practitioners need to embrace some of the marketing gems of this technology laden society; however, I suspect the solo practitioner's marketing efforts are actually being diluted when technology is the only strategy used to market their practice.

Technology has weakened the building and maintaining of relationships. Face-to-face meetings, phone calls and handwritten notes are slowly fading, and the quickest (and unknowingly least effective) approach is becoming the norm. Making eye contact while you explain to your client the consequences of his conduct is always more effective than an e-mail where tone cannot be determined and often is misinterpreted. Likewise, when you communicate solely through your keypad, important relationships wane and you fail to make new connections – not just contacts, but rather lasting connections.

Isn't building lasting connections, othners creased. The bindings are broken and split. Each book is treasured for the journey found within the weathered pages.

The popularity of Kindle, the wireless reading device, is harrowing. To read a book without the book is an example of technology gone astray. Soon bookstores will be and at home. People now use Facebook as they once used the telephone. As contact lists grew, the quality of relationships deteriorated. While your expanding list of "friends" on Facebook may make you feel popular, it is doing little for your business. The number of "friends" on your Facebook
